MISSOULA--

Three former University of Montana football stars have confirmed attendance at the Montana Special Olympics, which will be held in Missoula, May 16-18.

The three-day event, which will have approximately 1,200 participants, is sponsored by the Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr. Foundation, the University of Montana, and the Montana Jaycees.

Greg Anderson, Barry Darrow and Terry Falcon, all who moved on to professional careers from UM, said they would attend the Games.

Anderson, a defensive back, was named to the first team of the Associated Press' 1976 College Division All-American team. Anderson was a Big Sky Conference first team pick three times, in 1974-75-76--the only Grizzly to be so honored. He played pro ball for the Kansas City Chiefs, and also in the Canadian pro ranks.

Darrow was an Associated Press All-American honorable mention pick in 1971, and a Universal Sports second team AA pick that year. He was a first team All-BSC in 1972. Darrow has played in the National Football League several seasons, and was recently traded to the New Orleans Saints.

Falcon was an 8th round draft pick by the New England Patriots in 1977. He was also winner of the Paul Weskamp Award in 1977, an honor which goes to the Grizzlies' outstanding lineman.

Montana Special Olympics director, Gene Carlson, UM's head football coach, said he hoped to make more celebrity announcements soon.

Other NFL players who have already been announced are George Buehler (Cleveland Browns) and Sam McCullum (Seattle Seahawks).
